

As teenagers, Noe and Lisa Martinez heard stories about missionaries who had taken the Word of God to people who had never before heard the gospel. For both of them, the Lord used this and Romans 15:20-21 to compel them into career missions. In 2009, as a married couple with one daughter, they began training with New Tribes Mission, now known as Ethnos360.

They spent two years at New Tribes Bible Institute, followed by two years at the Missionary Training Center in Missouri.

They are now in Papua New Guinea as tribal church planters, and are working among the Tigak people group where there is already a small church. However, the believers are very young/immature in their faith. They have finished learning the tribal culture and language, so their main roles are now to disciple the believers there until there is a maturing, replicating and self-sustaining tribal church with the Bible translated into the people's heart language.
